Washington, March 20.—The Titanic struggle over the speaker of the house of representatives, which reached its climax late yesterday in the destruction of the speaker's power in the committee on rules, yet leaving Mr. Cannon the speakership itself, may have marked not so much the ending of a three days' battle as the commencement of a great political war. The speaker and his friends appear to interpret the refusal of the house to depose him as justifying them in claiming to have wrested victory from defeat, endorsement from repudiation. Not a few of the insurgents who voted for Mr. Cannon's retention are wondering today if they made a political blunder, whether their anti-Cannon constituents will not indeed hold their retaining him in the speakership to have nullified their vote to eliminate him from the rules committee.

Nobody Seems Happy Over the Out-

The republican regulars complacently claim that the insurgents who voted for the speaker have returned to the party fold. The democrats taunt these insurgents with having been recreant to the logic of their insurgency. Nobody seems entirely happy about the outcome. "I can speak for no one but myself, but if this is to be our reception, I am done. We were not cowards. We of the insurgents who cast our votes yesterdey against unseating Cannon were the bravest men in that house. It took consummate courage, and it will probably cost me my seat in congress. But if we are to be met with calumny because we sacrificed ourselves to save the house of representatives from chaos and disorder and to prevent the ruin of the republican party, then I am in favor of carrying this war to the finish." To attempt to predict whom the republicans will select would be the merest speculation.

The democratic leaders said today that they anticipated no difficulty in having their caucus selection for this committee ratified by the house, as the insurgent republicans had given them a pledge to support the democratic nominees, partly in consideration of the unanimous vote of the democratic for the Nortis resolution.

But the highly important matter of the selection of this new rules committee was of secondary consideration in the talk heard today as to whether the war within the ranks of the republican party was to continue or not.

Something in the Nature of a Truce

The legislative programme in congress was scarcely mentioned at all, excepting in connection with the probable delay it will encounter before the political air has become sufficiently clarified to go ahead with legislation. It was generally recognized that there must be restored some semblance of quiecude, something in the nature of a truce, if ultimate peace cannot just now be had, before congress can proceed with the calm and conscientious consideration of the important meas-
